My website curates three legendary graphic designers speaker series. When visiting my website, I want people to develop curiosity by revealing more information about the event as well as the designer. The home page will show a page that will show the logo of RISD Shared Voices along with their mission statement. When someone slides down the homepage, three names of the designers will show up. Then when someone hovers over one of the names, brief descriptions of each artist will show up underneath. Upon click, he will be going to the page (sliding down) where the artist image serves as the background and the date of the speech, time, locations and explanatory text will be sliding from left to right on to the page (or slide down and get placed on to the page). "See their works" section will have some images of their past projects.
